In a study of 136 children (171 fractures) with supracondylar fractures of the humerus treated by means of open reduction and internal fixation, the radiographic parameters of initial fracture configuration and the intraoperative measured changes in the humeral shaft were evaluated. Fractures in the upper third of the bone with involvement of the capitulum, fractures in the lower third of the bone with involvement of the tip, and fractures of the neck without involvement of the capitulum or the tip were considered to be AO type A fractures. The length of the humerus was measured on the radiographs taken at the time of initial fracture reduction and at the end of surgery. Intraoperative measurements were made in 11 fractures in which the intramedullary canal had been opened. In four children in whom the humeral canal was reduced to a diameter less than 2.5 mm, there was a mean loss of 4.5 mm of length of the bone. At the end of surgery, an average of 5.7 mm of
